Information Commissioner: People must trust their information is protected in the age of AI

New research on ADM and biometric technologies reveals that the public expect to understand exactly when and how AI powered systems affect them, and they are concerned about the consequences when these technologies go wrong – for example, if facial recognition technology (FRT) is used inaccurately, or a flawed automated decision impacts their job application.

Preparing for change: How the Data \(Use and Access\) Bill will transform UK data practices

The UK's data reform package in the form of the Draft Data (Use and Access) Bill (DUA) is nearing completion and is likely to be finalised imminently. In this article, the focus points look at the current shape of the Bill, the key reforms, how it could impact the EU Commission's review of the UK's adequacy decision and what you should be focussing on.

European Commission should rescind UK data adequacy

“Allowing third countries such as the UK to benefit from unrestricted personal data flows with the EU while simultaneously weakening legal safeguards at home does not only endanger the rights of people in the EU, it also undermines the credibility of the EU’s data protection framework, exposes EU businesses to unfair competition, and devalues the Union’s regulatory leadership on the global stage,” they wrote.
